Snow forecast - Monday 25 February 2013

It's another cold start to the week, but temperatures will recover a little from Wednesday onwards. There will be further snow in the coming days, but most of this will be in the southern Alps and, even here, not everywhere will see significant amounts.

Detailed forecast:

Austria

Today (Monday) will be cold but mostly dry with plenty of sunshine and just a few snow flurries in the far eastern Alps. Tuesday will be generally cloudier with a higher chance of snow flurries almost anywhere, but still heaviest in the eastern Austrian Alps. The far western Tirol (St Anton) and Vorarlberg areas should be drier and brighter, but it will remain relatively cold.

Wednesday should see fewer snow flurries, but a few will remain in the southern and eastern Austrian Alps. Elsewhere there should be some good sunny spells. Thursday looks like being dry and bright in all parts. It will feel noticeably milder too.

France

Most French resorts should be dry, bright but cold today (Monday). A few snow flurries will affect southern parts, however, especially close to the Italian border (e.g. Montgenèvre). It will remain rather cold but mostly bright on Tuesday with the odd snow flurry still possible close to Italy.

There will be little change on Wednesday and Thursday except that temperatures will begin to rise and it will feel noticeably milder.

Italy

Today (Monday) will be cold with snow affecting parts of the western Italian Alps – particularly the south-west (e.g. Sauze d'Oulx, Sestriere). Snow flurries may affect other parts too, but they will generally be more scattered with some valleys remaining dry and bright. Tuesday will see little change with a scattering of snow showers, chiefly in the far south-west, but also perhaps across the Dolomites.

By Wednesday and Thursday it should begin to turn a little milder, but snow flurries are still likely here and there, with some sunshine in between.

Switzerland

Today (Monday) will be mostly dry, cold and bright with just the outside chance of a snow shower in the far south, close to the Italian border. Tuesday will remain relatively cold and mostly dry with plenty of sunshine. The odd snow shower is possible in the east later in the day, however.

On Wednesday and Thursday it should be dry and bright just about everywhere, and feeling a bit milder too.
