Snow forecast

Updated: 2pm Friday 10 January 2014

The weather looks like being fairly benign this weekend with some sun, some cloud, and mild but not excessively warm temperatures. Some snow is likely in the western and south-western Alps later on Monday, spreading to many other areas on Tuesday.

Detailed snow forecast:

Austria

Saturday will be mostly dry with variable cloud amounts, but some sunshine too. It will be relatively mild once more with freezing levels above 2000m. There will be very little change on Sunday and Monday, but probably more in the way of sunshine (above any low lying valley fog).

France

Saturday will be dry with sunny spells, but also areas of (mostly high) cloud drifting around. It will be mild again (but not as mild as recently) with freezing levels around 2500m. Sunday will be very similar although there should be more in the way of sunshine and it will be slightly warmer.

Monday should start bright, but cloud is likely to increase with the chance of showers late in the day (snow possible above 1500m then 800m overnight).

Italy

Saturday and Sunday should stay dry across all Italian resorts with plenty of sunshine but also some areas of cloud drifting around from time to time. It will be relatively mild (but not quite as warm as the week just gone) with freezing levels typically close to 2500m.

Monday will see cloud thicken up in the western Italian Alps with the chance of snow showers (1000m) later.

Switzerland

Saturday will be dry with sunny spells and relatively mild temperatures (freezing levels around 2500m). Sunday will be similar, but perhaps with greater amounts of sunshine and also slightly warmer.

On Monday it will be mostly dry with the best of any sunshine in the eastern

Swiss Alps. Further west cloud is likely to thicken later in the day with the chance of some showers later (some snow above 1500m dropping to under 1000m later).

Outlook:

The outlook is very uncertain but it looks like turning considerably colder in the middle to latter part of next week with the chance of some mostly light snow here and there.
